

PROPERTY PROSPECTUS Kalamaja

Baltic revival Tallinn

Preface

A creative buzz and outward-looking development projects are adding verve to the water-side district of Kalamaja.

Writer

Gabriel Leigh

Photographer

Simon Bajada

North of Tallinn's centre, the tracks of the city's rattling tram lead to a grass-covered green belt, bordered by rows of wooden houses and the odd factory building in stone and brick. This is Kalamaja.

While the Estonian capital's Old Town hosts boozy visitors alighting ferries from Helsinki or Stockholm, this unassuming, low-rise neighbourhood is a world away from the city centre. It is also home to some of the city's most unique restaurants, cafés and shops. This is a place where young Tallinners with ideas and projects to pursue are now moving. Kalamaja's colourful wooden houses were built in the late 19th and early 20th century and have been well preserved throughout the Soviet occupation of the city between 1940 and the early 1990s.

Priit Juurmann and Yoko Alender are married with four children and bought an apartment in one of these houses 10 years ago. They later co-founded the bustling F Hoone restaurant in a disused Soviet-era factory building, serving Baltic and Eastern European-influenced dishes. "When we moved here it wasn't the place we saw it could be," says Alender. "I've seen how people can influence their own living environment. And that's what I found so positive here in northern Tallinn."

With its cheap properties, walkable streets and location between the Old Town and the Gulf of Finland, Kalamaja is ripe for development. Jaanus Juus is founder and owner of the Telliskivi Loomelinnak (creative city). The development occupies an expansive but only partly renovated factory compound, populated by a growing roster of shops, cafés, bars, design offices and galleries. "This is something we want to give our children," says Juus. "It's not a short-term project where we develop it and sell it for a profit."

A stroll around Kalamaja reveals a wealth of such entrepreneurial ventures. There's Pudel, a bar stocking beers from around the world, and Karl Annus's workshop where the craftsman makes wooden glasses. Sesoon serves an excellent Baltic lunch and Kalamaja Pagarikoda is an easy-to-miss bakery with the best Moscow buns in the city.

During Soviet rule, Kalamaja was used for heavy industry and some of its past can still be seen today; as MONOCLE

02

04

Property guide

Prices in Kalamaja have risen steadily over the past few years as the area's popularity has increased. As Estonian salaries are low by European standards, property in the area remains good value – especially given its proximity to the centre of town and seafront. There are several developments planned or in progress and property prices could rise significantly, particularly as the Noblessner development opens up the old Soviet shipyard. With many buildings still needing renovation and others empty, now is a good time to buy.

Prices

Average property price: €2,200 per sq m

Typical one-bedroom apartment: €110,000 to €160,000

Fully renovated commercial space to rent: €8 to €10 per sq m per month

Estate agent

Eero Ving, Euro Kinnisvarateenus
+372 662 6413
eurokv.ee

The resident

Yoko Alender
"Kalamaja is good for families – it's close to downtown so children can walk to school or go out and play. It gives them freedom to discover the world for themselves."

05

06

07

Shops

1 Majatohter

Stocking eco-friendly, natural building materials, salvaged home components and more (think antique doorknobs and recycled wood), Majatohter boasts knowledgeable staff who are on hand to advise on restorations to the wooden houses that characterise the area.
Väike-Patarei 3
+372 641 4509
majatohter.ee

2 Estonian Design House

Features clothing and items for the home, such as furniture, ceramics and objets d'art. Each is Estonian-designed and most are also made here. Visit the workshop, where designers craft their latest products and chat with visitors about their influences.
Kalasadama 8
+372 55 590 787
estoniandesignhouse.ee

3 Jooks Rattastudio

Bicycle shop founded this year by a handful of young Tallinners who were tired of sourcing bike components from abroad. In addition to selling the full range of kit they also organise city-wide rides and campaign for improved bicycle lanes.

Telliskivi 60a
+372 600 8228
jooks.cc

Eat & drink

4 F Hoone

One of the pioneers in the Telliskivi Creative City and still a community focal point, F Hoone is set in a restored factory space with soaring ceilings and a friendly atmosphere. It's a great place to while away the day and sample the Kalamaja burger, served on Baltic brown bread.
Telliskivi 60
+372 680 1114

5 Kukeke

Founded by popular Tallinn chef Anni Arro and located in an old railway depot, Kukeke features Baltic-inspired food with a focus on local, seasonal ingredients. The kama ice cream made from a traditional flour mixture is a highlight.
Telliskivi 57
+372 677 8738
kukeke.ee

08

09

09

10

11

- 01 Kalamaja's tram network
- 02 Entrance to F Hoone
- 03 Kitchen at F Hoone founder Yoko Alender's Kalamaja home
- 04 Yoko Alender's living room
- 05 Yoko Alender
- 06 Klaus café at the Estonian Design House
- 07 Reval Café
- 08 Local cuisine at F Hoone
- 09 Dining room at Kukeke
- 10 Craft beerhouse Pudel
- 11 Kukeke founder Anni Arro
- 12 Pre Soviet-era architecture visits, a freight train covered in Cyrillic script rolls past the new Indian restaurant, Lendav Taldrik. The waterfront is just a few minutes away but almost entirely blocked off by Soviet-era buildings including a vacant prison and what was a submarine factory and shipyard. But now many of these buildings are earmarked for development. One of the more advanced projects is Noblessner, which will include a seafront cycle lane and pedestrian paths, homes and restaurants.

The investment is good news for Kalamaja but its residents have had to work to ensure that the area maintains its charm and regains its historic link to the sea as these ambitious projects push ahead. "A seafront is a very valuable thing to have in a city and there's so much potential because it's not developed yet," says Teele Pehk at the Estonian Urban Lab, which studies and consults on urban planning and development.

"People are demanding more quality, the kind of quality that was absent 10 years ago," says Juurmann. "There's a new wave of urbanism going on and Estonia is so open to different possibilities. It's a very interesting time." — (M)

12

